The NDIA has completed an evaluation to identify the best goal-setting tools to measure outcomes in early supports for children and families.

This work will help us understand how to better measure outcomes for children and their families who access early supports through the early childhood approach.

Our evaluation considered whether the tools were:

- Valid – it measures what it is meant to
- Reliable – the results are stable under different conditions
- Responsive – it is responsive to change
- Acceptable – people who use it will find it suitable.

It will also help us design and organise services that lead to better outcomes.

You can read the evaluation report and summary on the NDIS website.
